In the 76 years since its inception, the National Health Service has until recently consistently been ranked the best healthcare service in the world. The model of a publicly accountable, publicly funded and provided universal health care service works. However, after years of de-funding and privatisation, the NHS is currently facing its worst crisis ever, with waiting lists of nearly 8 million, a staffing shortfall of 100,000 and 100s of preventable deaths every week.

The NHS has been transformed so it can increase profit-making potential, which is creating an unequal two-tier health system. There is a direct correlation between increasing outsourcing to private companies and falling standards in health care provision.

The founding model works and there is no alternative that has been shown to be better. Government must reaffirm it is committed to this model. That's why we need to grow the campaign to Keep Our NHS Public.
